

It has come to my attention, that the FCC is proposing to expand the broadcast service known as Low Power FM (LPFM) in such a way, that it would allow these new stations to take priority over current FM translator service.

I am not for this proposal. I am a current and committed listener to K-love, a Christian radio broadcast that is supported by listeners, and heard on the FM translators.

K-love provides contemporary christian music that appeals to both young adults, teenagers and children. I have not found another christian station that has played this type of contemporary music that can get our children excited about singing and absorbing the lyrics to these songs that provide a foundation of hope, faith, giving and praise. It is very important that my child sees that these songs (with value and faith) are played on the radio and can be just as "cool" as the other songs that lead our children astray.

This station also provides me with encouragement, faith and hope to go about my daily activities that can sometimes be overbearing.

If K-love were to be displaced by an LPFM broadcaster, my community and my family would not have an easily accessible source of music that provides encouragement, hope, prayer and vision. But, most importantly, my child would not hear the "cool, popular christian songs" on the radio that could, inevitably, encourage her to be a positive influence on our community.

The services provided by K-love is in the public interest. Due to the "contemporary" and/or "new" style of christian music played by K-Love, a greater number of listeners are tuned in to "positive" music that could influence our families, neighborhoods, schools, work environment, communities, country and world.

In conclusion, I am against the LPFM taking priority over current FM translator service. This could, potentially, deny our community of a valuable musical resource that could have a positive affect on our community.

Sincerely,

Maureen Pelo
